6 Ways To Support The Nervous System – A well-functioning and optimal nervous system is central to a healthy body. It helps different parts of your body communicate with each other, reacts to both internal and external changes, programs reflex movements, and supports memory and learning. Unfortunately, many people have gradual nerve damage that results from years of smoking, excessive alcohol consumption, and leading an unhealthy lifestyle. This results in life-impacting symptoms such as sensitivity, numbness, pain, tingling, burning, and even severe health challenges. To avoid or control these consequences, it is important that you take the right measures to support your nervous system functioning.

1. Exercise Daily

Regular exercise is arguably the best prescription for a health mind and body. It improves your mood, boosts energy, promotes better sleep and generally elevates your health. Make sure that you take that walk or jog on a daily basis, or at least most days of the week. When it comes to exercising for a healthy nervous system, you should also focus on mental exercises such as completing crossword puzzles. This helps sensitive your nerve receptors and can even go a long way to prevent memory loss, stroke, and paralysis.

2. Get enough sleep

How you sleep has a lot of impact on your physical and mental health. The National Sleep Foundation recommends that adults sleep for 7-9 hours per day. Spending enough time in bed will help you reduce stress, improve your mood, maintain a healthy weight, get sick less often, think more clearly, and lower your risk for severe health conditions such as heart problems and diabetes. Just like any other system in your body, your central nervous system will perform optimally when you are getting enough quality sleep.

3. Get some sunlight

Staying in the sun for too long can be bad for your skin. But spending some balanced time out there in those glorious rays is necessary for optimal health. Health experts recommend that you stay out in the sun for at least 10 minutes daily. This will help fortify your nervous system and improve your overall health. Even small children need this moderate amount of sunlight so that their skin can develop the Vitamin D that is needed to build strong bones. There are also the mood-lifting benefits of getting some warm sunlight whenever possible.
